Museums hold the power of experiential learning, with which they can facilitate the seamless development of 21st century skills. Through a wide variety of ways, like through daily programming, curricula, exhibits, floor interactives, online modules, basically how they interpret material culture. But museums today need to rethink if they have re-aligned their own roles to the needs of 21st century, whether they have themselves changed themselves from their old roles to the traditional deliverer of content or being the ultimate expert, to being more of a facilitator of learning, where they are relatively telling less and asking more. That's the most critical thing. If you want to be sought-after as a critical learning provider in the 21st century community. Libraries, too, especially libraries that are equipped with digital technologies have the immense power to facilitate self-directed learning that can in turn facilitate 21st century skills development.
